Photo radar is officially back on in two Valley cities.

Scottsdale and Chandler's cameras are up and running after a two-month break.

Phoenix police announced Friday that its photo enforcement cameras will also be going back online Wednesday, May 18.

Back in March, pretty much all major Valley cities shut down their enforcement programs after the attorney general labeled them illegal.

Legal analyst James Goodnow said the issue had to do with the third-party companies that were issuing the tickets.

"The opinion of the attorney general's office was that these are agencies that are gathering evidence in criminal cases, and you either have to be an officer of the court or a licensed private investigator," Goodnow said.

Officials from Chandler and Scottsdale said the cities went through the process to get everyone licensed so the programs could continue.

But tickets aren't being handed out just yet. Chandler, which activated the new traffic cameras at seven major intersections, is only issuing warnings until June 19.
